

Sunday Spoken English Classes for Sponsorship Students

Last year, I was surprised to find 21 students in my Sunday spoken English class. About half were continuing students from the past year, and the rest were new.

It is always a challenge to handle such a mixed group. It becomes necessary to repeat certain games and quizzes to bring everyone at par with each other. As a result, older students lose out on learning new things. But the Nishtha students are generally very polite and enthusiastic, and barring a couple of advanced students, everyone plays along happily.

There was one big difference between this batch and the previous ones- this batch had undergone Gender training by a local trainer. In the past batches, I had struggled with a peculiar difference in the behavior of girls and boys. The girls were extremely shy, and the boys boisterous and overconfident. Both these behavior patterns were detrimental to learning to speak English. Half my time would be spent in encouraging the girls to speak up and the boys to focus. The idea of the Gender training was to get them to view their behavior in the context of gender roles and to break the pattern.

It worked! There is more openness among the students, girls are participating more, and the boys are more respectful and accommodating. And the attendance is nearly 100% every week.

Given the class size, I changed a lot of my teaching methods. For one, I had them start learning and practicing English poems, songs and plays at the very start, instead of waiting towards the end of the year. I chose songs and plays that could accommodate large number of participants. I also started dividing the group into multiple smaller teams for class activities and games. It was a challenge but the batch has such enthusiastic students that I enjoyed the challenge.

We had planned to present three plays, a couple of poems and a song in English to an audience comprising the students' families and Nishtha staff in April of 2020. Practice was in full swing and everyone was working hard to remember their lines. Unfortunately, all that has come to a halt due to the pandemic. But I am certain that we will pick up where we left off once the lockdown opens.

Sunday Spoken English Classes for Sponsorship Students

Last year, I was surprised to find 21 students in my Sunday spoken English class. About half were continuing students from the past year, and the rest were new.

It is always a challenge to handle such a mixed group. It becomes necessary to repeat certain games and quizzes to bring everyone at par with each other. As a result, older students lose out on learning new things. But the Nishtha students are generally very polite and enthusiastic, and barring a couple of advanced students, everyone plays along happily.

There was one big difference between this batch and the previous ones- this batch had undergone Gender training by a local trainer. In the past batches, I had struggled with a peculiar difference in the behavior of girls and boys. The girls were extremely shy, and the boys boisterous and overconfident. Both these behavior patterns were detrimental to learning to speak English. Half my time would be spent in encouraging the girls to speak up and the boys to focus. The idea of the Gender training was to get them to view their behavior in the context of gender roles and to break the pattern.

It worked! There is more openness among the students, girls are participating more, and the boys are more respectful and accommodating. And the attendance is nearly 100% every week.

Given the class size, I changed a lot of my teaching methods. For one, I had them start learning and practicing English poems, songs and plays at the very start, instead of waiting towards the end of the year. I chose songs and plays that could accommodate large number of participants. I also started dividing the group into multiple smaller teams for class activities and games. It was a challenge but the batch has such enthusiastic students that I enjoyed the challenge.

We had planned to present three plays, a couple of poems and a song in English to an audience comprising the students' families and Nishtha staff in April of 2020. Practice was in full swing and everyone was working hard to remember their lines. Unfortunately, all that has come to a halt due to the pandemic. But I am certain that we will pick up where we left off once the lockdown opens.

Sunday Spoken English Classes for Sponsorship Students

Last year, I was surprised to find 21 students in my Sunday spoken English class. About half were continuing students from the past year, and the rest were new.

It is always a challenge to handle such a mixed group. It becomes necessary to repeat certain games and quizzes to bring everyone at par with each other. As a result, older students lose out on learning new things. But the Nishtha students are generally very polite and enthusiastic, and barring a couple of advanced students, everyone plays along happily.

There was one big difference between this batch and the previous ones- this batch had undergone Gender training by a local trainer. In the past batches, I had struggled with a peculiar difference in the behavior of girls and boys. The girls were extremely shy, and the boys boisterous and overconfident. Both these behavior patterns were detrimental to learning to speak English. Half my time would be spent in encouraging the girls to speak up and the boys to focus. The idea of the Gender training was to get them to view their behavior in the context of gender roles and to break the pattern.

It worked! There is more openness among the students, girls are participating more, and the boys are more respectful and accommodating. And the attendance is nearly 100% every week.

Given the class size, I changed a lot of my teaching methods. For one, I had them start learning and practicing English poems, songs and plays at the very start, instead of waiting towards the end of the year. I chose songs and plays that could accommodate large number of participants. I also started dividing the group into multiple smaller teams for class activities and games. It was a challenge but the batch has such enthusiastic students that I enjoyed the challenge.

We had planned to present three plays, a couple of poems and a song in English to an audience comprising the students' families and Nishtha staff in April of 2020. Practice was in full swing and everyone was working hard to remember their lines. Unfortunately, all that has come to a halt due to the pandemic. But I am certain that we will pick up where we left off once the lockdown opens.

Sunday Spoken English Classes for Sponsorship Students

Last year, I was surprised to find 21 students in my Sunday spoken English class. About half were continuing students from the past year, and the rest were new.

It is always a challenge to handle such a mixed group. It becomes necessary to repeat certain games and quizzes to bring everyone at par with each other. As a result, older students lose out on learning new things. But the Nishtha students are generally very polite and enthusiastic, and barring a couple of advanced students, everyone plays along happily.

There was one big difference between this batch and the previous ones- this batch had undergone Gender training by a local trainer. In the past batches, I had struggled with a peculiar difference in the behavior of girls and boys. The girls were extremely shy, and the boys boisterous and overconfident. Both these behavior patterns were detrimental to learning to speak English. Half my time would be spent in encouraging the girls to speak up and the boys to focus. The idea of the Gender training was to get them to view their behavior in the context of gender roles and to break the pattern.

It worked! There is more openness among the students, girls are participating more, and the boys are more respectful and accommodating. And the attendance is nearly 100% every week.

Given the class size, I changed a lot of my teaching methods. For one, I had them start learning and practicing English poems, songs and plays at the very start, instead of waiting towards the end of the year. I chose songs and plays that could accommodate large number of participants. I also started dividing the group into multiple smaller teams for class activities and games. It was a challenge but the batch has such enthusiastic students that I enjoyed the challenge.

We had planned to present three plays, a couple of poems and a song in English to an audience comprising the students' families and Nishtha staff in April of 2020. Practice was in full swing and everyone was working hard to remember their lines. Unfortunately, all that has come to a halt due to the pandemic. But I am certain that we will pick up where we left off once the lockdown opens.

Sunday Spoken English Classes for Sponsorship Students

Last year, I was surprised to find 21 students in my Sunday spoken English class. About half were continuing students from the past year, and the rest were new.

It is always a challenge to handle such a mixed group. It becomes necessary to repeat certain games and quizzes to bring everyone at par with each other. As a result, older students lose out on learning new things. But the Nishtha students are generally very polite and enthusiastic, and barring a couple of advanced students, everyone plays along happily.

There was one big difference between this batch and the previous ones- this batch had undergone Gender training by a local trainer. In the past batches, I had struggled with a peculiar difference in the behavior of girls and boys. The girls were extremely shy, and the boys boisterous and overconfident. Both these behavior patterns were detrimental to learning to speak English. Half my time would be spent in encouraging the girls to speak up and the boys to focus. The idea of the Gender training was to get them to view their behavior in the context of gender roles and to break the pattern.

It worked! There is more openness among the students, girls are participating more, and the boys are more respectful and accommodating. And the attendance is nearly 100% every week.

Given the class size, I changed a lot of my teaching methods. For one, I had them start learning and practicing English poems, songs and plays at the very start, instead of waiting towards the end of the year. I chose songs and plays that could accommodate large number of participants. I also started dividing the group into multiple smaller teams for class activities and games. It was a challenge but the batch has such enthusiastic students that I enjoyed the challenge.

We had planned to present three plays, a couple of poems and a song in English to an audience comprising the students' families and Nishtha staff in April of 2020. Practice was in full swing and everyone was working hard to remember their lines. Unfortunately, all that has come to a halt due to the pandemic. But I am certain that we will pick up where we left off once the lockdown opens.

Sunday Spoken English Classes for Sponsorship Students

Last year, I was surprised to find 21 students in my Sunday spoken English class. About half were continuing students from the past year, and the rest were new.

It is always a challenge to handle such a mixed group. It becomes necessary to repeat certain games and quizzes to bring everyone at par with each other. As a result, older students lose out on learning new things. But the Nishtha students are generally very polite and enthusiastic, and barring a couple of advanced students, everyone plays along happily.

There was one big difference between this batch and the previous ones- this batch had undergone Gender training by a local trainer. In the past batches, I had struggled with a peculiar difference in the behavior of girls and boys. The girls were extremely shy, and the boys boisterous and overconfident. Both these behavior patterns were detrimental to learning to speak English. Half my time would be spent in encouraging the girls to speak up and the boys to focus. The idea of the Gender training was to get them to view their behavior in the context of gender roles and to break the pattern.

It worked! There is more openness among the students, girls are participating more, and the boys are more respectful and accommodating. And the attendance is nearly 100% every week.

Given the class size, I changed a lot of my teaching methods. For one, I had them start learning and practicing English poems, songs and plays at the very start, instead of waiting towards the end of the year. I chose songs and plays that could accommodate large number of participants. I also started dividing the group into multiple smaller teams for class activities and games. It was a challenge but the batch has such enthusiastic students that I enjoyed the challenge.

We had planned to present three plays, a couple of poems and a song in English to an audience comprising the students' families and Nishtha staff in April of 2020. Practice was in full swing and everyone was working hard to remember their lines. Unfortunately, all that has come to a halt due to the pandemic. But I am certain that we will pick up where we left off once the lockdown opens.

